Who is blame ?

There is much talk these days of mass failure in our schools. Many students are eager to go to school and parents are anxious to send their children to schools. This enthusiasm has made our classrooms overcrowded, considering that the demand of school is far higher the number of school available, especially government schools.

However, this enthusiasm is not seen once the students are admitted into the schools. Very few of them pass studies carried out prove that net class or pass official examination. When this happens, the blame is put on the teachers. But late payment of school fees by parents, failure to buy textbooks by parents, the presence of drinking parlours and "game houses" near schools which attract the students. Some students actually do not have the enthusiasm to study. Other are forced to study general or technical education against their will. The environment in which the students live also contributes to the success or failure. We also have social-cultural factor that hinder success in schools today. Some students play all the time. Hence, we see that although the teacher is the facilitator or catalyst of the learning process, he is not the only one who determines whether students pass or fail. We are all involved. As such, each time students fail, we should each who determine ourselves and see the role we played in that failure. The educational process involves many people.
