The word of refugees

There are refugees in the world than ever before in history. These are people who have suffered so much violence or persecution in their homeland that have been forced to flee either to another country or to a safer region of their own country. Many end up living in tents in crowded refugee camps, without sufficient food, water, healthcare or education. In many places, violence and fighting continue to threaten their lives, even in exile.

This was the fate of hundreds of thousands of people from the Darfur region of Sudan in East Africa. For decades there had been tension between two groups of population over land rights. A brutal civil war broke out in 2003 between government troops and rebel fighters, forcing more than three million people to flee their homes. Over a million of people were living in camps in Sudan while many fled to neighboring Chad to find safety. But nowhere was safe and looting and rebel attacks against civilians and aid works continued throughout the war-torn region and even across the border. Tens of thousands of civilians were killed while tens of thousands more died from starvation.

The situation in Sudan has been described as one of the worst humanitarian tragedies in recent years. Unfortunately it is developing countries which bear most of the refugees. These host countries have neither the resources nor the land to cope with so many people. One of the most generous African host countries in the past was Tanzania which sheltered huge numbers of refugees fleeing different conflicts. But this open door policy caused major problems with refugees competing with local people for scarce resources.
